Healthy future?

London after Tomlinson Re-organising big city medicine

Health services in many big cities, in Britain and elsewhere, are no longer appropriate to serve populations that have moved out to the suburbs. Commissioned by the government to provide some answers to London's health care problems, the Tomlinson report raises as many questions:

- What are the implications of its proposals for the future of health care in London and other big cities?
- How are the substantial improvements in primary and community health care to be brought about?
- What support is needed for teaching and research?

In London after the Tomlinson experts look at the issues raised by the report and suggest solutions. Whatever the decisions made for London, it is clear that the problems are not unique to London but are shared by many other large cities both in the United Kingdom and in other developed countries.
